Layers Photoshop layers are the fundamental unit of any composite image, such as a photo of a building and the objects in it. This combination image is a _layer_ made up of two elements: a _background layer_ and a _foreground layer_. * Background layer : The layers on this layer let you see your image _enmasse_ — that is, as a single layer, but you can add more pieces to it by turning them into a new layer. These layers hold other layers, but they are visible from the beginning of the image-making process. * Foreground layer : When you add a new layer by pressing Ctrl+Shift+N (Option-Shift-N on the Mac), a new layer is created. You can think of the layers on this new layer as being in the foreground of the final composite image. Layers appear on the foreground layer when you print or save your image. The layers on the background layer allow you to view all the layers you've created in the image and to edit them. The layers on the foreground layer allow you to add new things, such as objects, plants, and text, and the layers on these new layers can be deleted or moved to the background layer. Figure 5.2. The layers palette in Photoshop's Layers palette shows all the layers in your image. You can bring a new image into Photoshop by clicking and dragging a new image from the Finder's window onto the image-editing program's canvas. You can also use any other files you have on your computer, such as music files or word processing documents, as your background. The following sections examine layers and describe how to use them.

Over 40 million copies of Elements have been sold and are still selling. They have been used to edit images for over 10 years. Many people use them to make YouTube, Instagram and Pinterest content. After launching the Creative Cloud version I started to learn a lot about a lot of people using Photoshop. Here is a survey that includes around 250 people. Not everyone answered all questions While some of the results might be surprising at first, they can help you get a better idea about the depth of knowledge of graphic designers, web designers and photographers. More than 70% of the people we surveyed have some knowledge in graphic design, and 56% of the respondents have some experience making graphic design. 33% are using Photoshop for making videos, 30% for creating new backgrounds, 30% for creating new designs. 97% use Photoshop for editing images, 87% for making web content, and 77% for making memes. Here is a more detailed description of the questions that we asked people. Electrical stimulation of the paraventricular nucleus (PVN) produces increased anxiety in the rat. This stress in response to PVN stimulation involves the release of [Met]enkephalin from the PVN. The present study was undertaken to determine if the enkephalinergic neuronal activity of periaqueductal gray matter (PAG) was involved in the expression of this anxiety. Electrical stimulation of the PVN produced a reduction in [Met]enkephalin-like immunoreactivity within PAG, while injections of the tracer retrogradely into the PAG with cholera toxin B revealed that the perikarya and axons of PAG enkephalinergic neurons in the dorsolateral PAG were activated by electrical stimulation of the PVN. The simultaneous electrical activation of PVN neurons by a bimodal conditioning stimulation facilitated the concomitant increase 388ed7b0c7

Backup to Google Drive - mohkohn ===== mohkohn Interesting that most answers seem to be to the first question that comes to mind. Backing up data offsite seems to be seen as a low priority for users. The fact that it's not _backing up_ is surprising. ~~~ whb07 Probably the obvious, "who is watching the watchers" angle. I'm part of a team that builds an enterprise video service. We've had to deal with a ton of companies offering security reasons why they won't give you a backup from them when you're spending so much time and money on getting them online. Our solution was the same as everyone else, but backed up to a different location. Customers are happy because they still get what they need, and we don't have the same conversations that we used to. We're certainly not the only ones in this game, but that was the angle I had in mind when reading your reply. ~~~ hunterloftis This is why I've started backing up to a channel in Firebase. You can make a channel that points to a public URL and you can use Cloud Functions to monitor that channel and handle any changes to the blob when it happens. ~~~ devmunchies This is EXACTLY why I use rsync to copy over my bucket to heroku every time I make a change. I would never want to rely on cloud functions or firebase or any other third party service for that matter. ----- miguelrochefort I never thought of this. I guess it's pretty good to have your data's infrastructure in the same place. But you don't seem to have a real strategy to keep things up to date. I know our infrastructure has changed from day one to day 6, why wouldn't you plan to also keep up to date your online backup? ~~~ jasonlotito What? The conversation here has nothing to do with backup. ~~~ miguelrochefort Isn't it to prevent data loss? ~~~ jasonlotito There is no saying it prevents data loss
